Teach your carpenters never to do any sawing over a finished beam box. The sawdust and chips will all have to be cleaned out again, and it is unnecessary carelessness. Sometimes with very deep girders, it may be necessary to secure the sides against bulging from the pressure at the half depth. A good way is to use No. 9 iron wire. Drill two small holes in each girder side opposite each other and pass the ends of a suitable piece of wire through. Twist the ends together securely on the outside, then if necessary put a small stick or rod between the two strands inside the form and twist until the sides are brought together tight up against a spreader of the right length. Of course the wire must bear on some piece or cleat or something in the loops...
