Excerpt: . . . the direct result of the labours of a single man. All but invariably it has resulted from the successive labours of many men. And again, it must not be overlooked that, in regard of the advances of Medicine as a practical art, the silent workers render most efficient aid; the results of their unspoken experience confirming or refuting the published assertions of the few. It is to the experience of the mass of the profession that we look for the final establishment of doctrine and of rules of practice. In the selection I am about to make, in confirmation of the statement that our science, in its advance as a practical art, stands second to none, I am conscious that I shall pass by some facts which others will think of greater value than those I have chosen as illustrations; and that others would...
