My Dear Sir, I have not the pleasure of knowing you personally; but your history and writings have given me an interest in you which induces and encourages me to address you with something of the freedom of acquaintance. I feel myself attracted to the friends of humanity, and freedom, however distant; and when such are exposed by their principles to peril, and loss, and stand firm in the evil day, I take pleasure in expressing to them my sympathy and admiration. The first accounts which reached me of the violence which drove you from Cincinnati inclined me to write to you; but your Narrative of those riotous proceedings, which I have lately received and read, does not permit me to I remain longer silent. The subject weighs much on my mind. I feel that I have a duty to perform in relation to it, and I cannot rest till I yield to this conviction till I obey what seems to me the voice of God. I think it best, however, not to confine myself to the outrage at Cincinnati, but to extend my remarks to the spirit of violence and persecution, which has broken out against the Abolitionists through the whole country. This, I know, will be more acceptable to you, than any expression of sympathy with you as an individual. You look beyond yourself to the cause which you have adopted, and to the much injured body of men, With whom you are associated. It is not my purpose to speak of the abolitionists as abolitionists. They now stand before the world in...
