Behind it are the gentle acclivities of the coast range, broken by canons which reach far into its solitudes. The spires and mansions of the metropolis of the Pacific Coast rise in the distance. The ocean, which laps into the land between headlands and islands bristling with cannon, breaks softly along its meadows; the cold sea-winds are agreeably attempered before they reach it; the damp fogs touch it with their sun-gilt fringes, and, scarcely knowing whether to-smile or frown, hang in picturesque gloom about its hilltops. Seen from San Francisco on a bright spring afternoon, Berkeley seems a gray, ribbon-like strip, drawn close in between the water and the hills. More nearly observed, it expands into a broad slope, or tilted plain, with a rise so gradual that, in crossing it, one attains a considerable elevation before he is aware that he has left the level of the ocean. Hence, it has height without the effort of ascent, and those desirable accidents of height, pure air, and an ample prospect which includes plain, valley, mountain, inlet, island, and nearly every other incidental feature of earth, water, and atmosphere, considered essential to fine landscape. This natural panorama of San Francisco Bay and the adjacent hills is specially remarkable for a refined variety of outline and color, but the noblest effects are not wanting. The praise may seem extravagant, but it is...
