Excerpt: .in the apple-flower; tales of the weird Sisters, that breathe the lightnings, hors'd on winds; Tales of Death's chariot, drawn by skeletons, That wave their hell-brands o'er the future grave; They told, and he believ'd them. Did the owl Shriek to the pauses of the midnight storm? Battles he saw in heaven on the sanguine clouds, Death in the flapping of the night-bird's wing. And if, aslope night's azure, like a star, Ignited vapors stream'd, enlightening earth. War, change, and pestilence, predicted he, Commotion., and the rage of maniac men. And each day thrice in secret prayer he kneel'd, That he might die in peace: alas, alas, In weakness strong, arm'd with infirmity, Too fondly we believe the dreams of Hope! He fear'd to doubt his wish; but in the war All shatter'd...
