Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Bygone Memories: And Other Poems One of the last of the ever-delightful essays published by Richard Jeffries was an exposition of the variety of the colour yellow. Taking the flower of the common marigold, the skin of an orange, and a gold sovereign for starting points, and adding other illustrations as he proceeded, he showed that there was in that one colour a perfect arch of graded shades. If this be the case in the world of colour, and in a single colour of that world, how much more, if a Richard Jeffries were still here to do it, could variety be shown in the grading of poetry. Poetry depends for its very existence on elements which are subject to variety, and are themselves various. It is the expression of the differing moods, temperaments, and training of the poets themselves. It is the record of the ten thousand differing events in the history of individual life, home, and country. It is the joy or sorrow, the love or blight, of the singer, or of the age or people of whom he sings. It induces impressions from external nature and from passing life.
